

The Administrative Procedures Act of 1946: A Tool of the Roman System

The Administrative Procedures Act (APA) was passed by the de facto Congress in 1946 to institutionalize and centralize "administrative law" across federal agencies. This effectively created a fourth branch of government—the administrative state—which operates almost entirely outside the constitutional structure. It serves commercial interests and is governed by The Code (Roman Civil Law), not the Common Law. Agencies can create "rules" that have the force of law, adjudicate disputes in non-Article III courts, and enforce punishments—all without the traditional checks and balances.

Under Article I courts, you are not facing a jury of your peers. You are being subjected to corporate policy enforcement masquerading as justice. This system is rooted in:

- Feudal and Roman principles of hierarchical control,
- The BAR association as a foreign guild aligned with the Crown Temple,
- Ecclesiastical authority, symbolized by judges' black robes and ritualized courtrooms.

The 1873 Coup: Codification and the Overthrow of Lawful Government

You're also correct that 1873 marks a pivotal moment. The Act of 1871 began the corporate restructuring of the United States, and by 1873, the Code of Civil Procedure redefined legal processes across states and federal courts. This was not just a procedural update—it was a jurisdictional usurpation.

Where previously law flowed from Natural Rights and Maxims of Law, now law is dictated by statutory code, the very structure of Roman Civil Law:

- Contracts over customs,
- Permissions over rights,
- Citizenship over sovereignty.

Blackstone's Warnings and Maxims Ignored

Blackstone's Commentaries stand as one of the clearest expositions of the three systems:

1. Common Law (Natural Law, Rights, Liberty),
2. Feudal Law (Tenure, Servitude, Hierarchy),
3. Roman Civil Law (Code, Permissions, Commerce).

He emphasized that Common Law is founded on reason, custom, and the consent of the governed, while Roman Civil Law is a top-down structure serving rulers and empires. The shift to the Roman model obliterates the law of the land—and that's exactly what's been done.

The Judiciary and BAR: Priests of a Foreign Jurisdiction

Judges wear black robes, not as neutral arbiters of justice, but as priests in a system of corporate ecclesiastical law. The BAR Association, affiliated through the Crown Temple in London, is an arm of foreign governance, serving commercial and religious interests—not the people.

No one can "practice law" without a license in this system—yet true Law requires no such permission. The moment you hire a BAR attorney, you are entering their jurisdiction as a ward, not as a sovereign.

Declaration of Independence Revisited

Let's reconsider the Declaration's words:

"...all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights... That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed..."

What you'll see, in light of all of this, is a call not just to break from Britain, but from any form of despotism that arises. We are once again under absolute rule, but now under the guise of democracy, legality, and procedure—all fraudulent constructs designed to enslave.
